Zinn's journey begins in 1964, when he travels to Selma, Alabama, to participate in the Selma to Montgomery marches. He witnesses the brutality of the police response to the marchers, and he is deeply moved by the courage and determination of the protesters. Zinn's diary entries from this period are filled with a sense of urgency and passion. He writes, "I have never seen anything like the courage of these people. They are facing down the most brutal and racist police force in the country, and they are not backing down."

Zinn's journey continues through the rest of the 1960s, and he witnesses many of the key events of the civil rights movement. He is present at the March on Washington in 1963, and he travels to Mississippi to help with voter registration drives. He also witnesses the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. in 1968.

Zinn's diary entries from this period are filled with a mix of hope and despair. He is inspired by the progress that the civil rights movement is making, but he is also aware of the deep-seated racism that still exists in American society. He writes, "The civil rights movement has made great strides, but there is still much work to be done. We must continue to fight for equality and justice for all Americans."

Howard Zinn's Southern Diary is an essential read for anyone who wants to understand the civil rights movement in the United States. Zinn's personal account of the events of this period is both moving and informative, and his insights into the nature of racism and discrimination are still relevant today.

If you are interested in learning more about the civil rights movement, I highly recommend reading Howard Zinn's Southern Diary. It is a powerful and important book that will stay with you long after you finish reading it.
