The History of Northern Hemisphere Body Art Tattoos

The origins of tattooing in the Northern Hemisphere can be traced back to ancient times. In Siberia, archaeologists have discovered tattooed mummies dating back to the 5th century BCE. These tattoos depict animals, geometric patterns, and scenes from everyday life, suggesting that tattooing was an important part of Siberian culture.

In Europe, the Celts were known for their intricate and elaborate tattoos. Celtic tattoos often featured spirals, knots, and other geometric designs, and they were believed to have both protective and decorative purposes. The Romans and Greeks also practiced tattooing, but their tattoos were typically more simple and less elaborate than those of the Celts.

In the Americas, Native American tribes have a long tradition of tattooing. Native American tattoos often depict animals, plants, and other symbols that are sacred to the tribe. These tattoos are often used to mark important life events, such as coming of age or marriage.

In the Pacific Islands, Polynesian and Maori tattoos are some of the most iconic and recognizable in the world. Polynesian tattoos are characterized by their bold, geometric designs, while Maori tattoos are known for their intricate and flowing lines. Both Polynesian and Maori tattoos are deeply rooted in the culture and mythology of their respective peoples.
